evaluating the type and placement of equipment on the structure during demolition.

Bridge Demolition Submittal

Much of the survey focused on the submittal of a bridge demolition plan. Of the 42 parties that were asked if they required a demolition plan for bridge projects, 85% or 35 said that they do. To learn more about submittal requirements for those 35 state DOTs, information was gathered in three categories.

Submittal Content Requirements

Project delivery method is defined as a system used by an agency for organizing and financing design, construction, operations, and maintenance services for a structure or facility. Some common examples are "design-bid-build," "design-build," and "public-private partnership." Part of the purpose of this section of the survey was to gauge whether, of the 35 state DOTs that require a submittal of a bridge demolition plan, it is common practice to vary demolition submittal requirements with project delivery methods. Eight (23%) of the state DOTs do vary the requirements with project delivery methods.

Of those eight state DOTs, one reason provided was "design-build jobs may negotiate a different process for removal," but the overwhelming response was that complex structures or larger bridges, which may or may not also affect the type of delivery method used, were greater factors as to what is required for the submittal of a demolition plan.

Bridge demolition can be a total bridge demolition, or a partial demolition, both of which may be a phased demolition. Of the 35 state DOTs that require submittal of a demolition plan, the type of demolition for which they require a submittal is shown in Figure 5.

Most state DOTs require a demolition plan submittal on every bridge demolition type, including demolition over bodies of water or demolition that specifically requires blasting. Michigan and Iowa require the submittal of a demolition plan only when dealing with a "complex" or "unique" structure, respectively, while Louisiana and North Carolina only require a submittal for partial or phased demolition, and five state DOTs only require a submittal for one of the three demolition types.

The common elements required as part of the submittal were a sequence of work narrative and demolition drawings, as indicated by 30 and 25 of the 35 agencies, respectively. The other often cited elements were temporary support and bracing drawings, supporting engineering
