ABOUT THE CONFERENCE

Indian Management Education: Catching up with the Best, Globally

With nearly 3300 business schools across the country, India is the home to the largest business education community in the world.

While Indian industry and Indian management talent have no doubt made their mark on the world scene, Indian Management Education itself has had less global visibility than might be expected. Many of our leading management institutes fail to attract talent from other countries, both as students and faculty. Despite tie-ups with several international management institutes, exchange of faculty and meaningful collaborations in knowledge creation remain alarmingly low.

Indian management institutes have also fought shy of international accreditation agencies such as AACSB, EQUIS, AMBA, ACBSP, etc. This is one of the reasons why Indian management institutes are not on the radar of aspiring students from Europe, USA, China, Japan or other Asian countries much as their quest for diversity in business learning experience leaves enormous scope for what India offers.

The somewhat cloistered disposition of Indian business schools towards global outreach is in stark contrast with institutions even from other Asian countries including China, Japan, South Korea, Malaysia and Singapore which have actively pursued internationalisation of their student base, faculty and curriculum.

Time to Transform

Even as more than 300,000 potential business managers graduate annually from India's business schools, quality of the education they receive would need enhancement. For another, only a limited number of our management schools can aspire for international recognition and fewer still are actively pursuing such recognition or global benchmarking. This state of affairs would require urgent attention and remedial measures all the more in view of the likelihood of the Indian higher education sector being opened soon to foreign universities and institutions of higher learning with the disruptive changes that the process will involve.

How do we go about changing the situation? If stodgy pedagogies and curriculum are to be discarded, what should take their place? Do we experiment, and try to design our own models? Or should we import methods and practices from elsewhere? What challenges in terms of adaptation or innovation do our management educators and other stakeholders face in this context? What possible role can government and regulatory agencies play in promoting greater internationalisation of Indian management education? How are business schools particularly from BRICS and South East Asia gearing up to meet similar challenges?

These are some of the questions that the conference, the participants of which will include prominent management educationists from India and overseas as well as leading representatives of government and business, will endeavour to address through its presentations and discussions.

Participation

The Conference is targeted at B School Directors / Dean / HoDs / Senior Faculty / Recruiters / Industry Leaders and Industry Association Functionaries and all others who have a stake in the future of the B School eco-system.
